

Synopsis: From birth, David Klein had been linked to a computer. As an infant, he was oblivious to the external world. When he awoke at age four, he quickly made up for time lost. David was hyper-brilliant in all forms of intelligence, except with how to deal with real people. If people knew of the illegal operation, or his computer link-up, David knew he'd be branded a monster. His father had often fled one-step ahead of authorities. He had been hidden away at home for the first sixteen years of his life, where he had not talked to any other humans other than his father. His father decided that it was now time to leave the safety of home and learn to interact with the 'rabble'. He sends David to a small liberal arts college.

David attempts, with occasional success, to hide how much he knows, which includes all the collective knowledge of humanity. His focus is how to find women. The first was the wrong one at the right time and the second was the right one at the wrong time. Having escaped the rigors of introductory classes, David solves the secrets of gravity. He solves humanity's problems, while avoiding their assassins. He learns the meaning of sharing and love and helping others. He tries to forget he's a monster.

David and his family usher in the next and final age of mankind.